When Russborough was left to the Irish public in 1978, Sir Alfred and Lady Beit also left the gift of learning, art, and architecture for everyone to enjoy. Today, we delight in subtle traces of a bygone world thanks to their generosity. Over €1 million has been spent as part of ongoing conservation and maintenance to ensure the future of the 300-year-old house. Much-needed improvements to security, electrics and building conservation have been carried out but the main attraction for visitors is the new display of major paintings, furniture and silver that previously adorned the house. Some of the new exhibits are from the Alfred Beit Collection of art and have not been seen for decades; others have been loaned back by the National Gallery of Ireland from the original 'Milltown Collection' and have not been seen in Russborough House for 120 years.
